HANDKERCHIEF CLUE TO MEN WHO ATTACKED CHILD

Found Near Place of Assault Marked "J," and the Police Think They May Soon Make an Arrest.

After waiting nearly twenty-four hours before becoming active the police of the Fort Hamilton Precinct late this afternoon found the first clues to the identity of one of the two men, who, yesterday, brutally assaulted eight-year-old Olga Schramek, the child of rich Brooklyn parents living in Dyker Heights.

Accompanied by the victim's father a dozen policemen and detectives searched the thicket where the outrage was committed.

Ten feet from the spot where the little girl was felled they found a soiled white handkerchief bearing the initial "J."

It was stated that the police would probably arrest on suspicion a well-educated young Italian who lives in the neighborhood. After the finding of the handkerchief it was stated that there were sufficient grounds to justify the taking into custody of this man. One of his friends is also being sought.

While angry citizens of the Bay Ridge section are seeking to-day to find the two brutes who cruelly assaulted the little girl, the Police Department is doing its feeble best to explain why a popular and amply respectable residential section should be left practically without police protection day after day, and why, when an outrage like the one of yesterday afternoon occurs, the civilians who try to report it are jeered at over the wire and ignored by patrolmen doing service as telephone operators.

Every few days during the past six weeks Manhattan has been stirred by news of an attack of some defenseless child or young girl, one such attack being marked by the murder, under sordid circumstances, of the little victim. But Brooklyn has escaped.

Bonds for Bloodhounds.

Now with the daughter of one of their richest members lying at the bedside and the Empire City Club and the Dyker Heights Country Club and the other neighborhood generally talk seriously of forming a vigilance association for the protection of their wives and families.

"I have sent for bloodhounds," said August Schramek to-day to a reporter for The Evening World. "Maybe they can trace the scoundrels who assaulted my child. It's a feeble hope, I know, but I am desperate to do something to punish the miscreants."

The father of the mistreated child is president of the Louis J. Porr Lithographic Company, of 100 Horatio street. He lives in a handsome home at Eighty-second street and Twelfth avenue.

"As God is my judge, I won't ask the aid of the police or any private man if I can get my hands on these two men," he said. "May God guide me to them, and aim my hand."

"One thing is sure, I cannot hope for aid from the authorities. Since this thing has happened not a single policeman has been near me. Not a detective has visited my house to get the appearance of the men. All that is being done is done by myself and my neighbors."

Yesterday afternoon his two daughters—Olga, aged eight, and Ella, aged seven—got permission from their mother to go to a vacant lot on the edge of the scrubby woodland that runs from Seventy-ninth street to Eighteenth avenue. The children had often taken a short cut across the commons on their way to and from school, and they knew berries grew wild in the undergrowth. They carried a basket.

Intended a Surprise.

"Papa will have a big surprise to-night when he comes home and finds so many nice berries we've picked for him," Olga called out to her mother as the two pinafore-clad little figures started down the street, side by side.

According to their stories they were gathering berries from the bushes that skirted the road when two men came from under the trees and halted alongside them. One was tall and

PAVEMENT SINKS NEAR WALDORF ALMOST A FOOT

Water Pipe Bursts and Floods Street as Collapse Comes—Tunnel Work the Cause.

GUESTS ARE ALARMED.

Street at Once Closed to Vehicles Between Broadway and Fifth Avenue.

Without the slightest warning the pavement of Thirty-third street, west of Fifth avenue, sunk from ten inches to a foot this afternoon.

The depression extends about seventy-five feet from the Fifth avenue line well back toward the alley to the west of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

The collapse of the pavement is due to the Pennsylvania Railroad tunnel, which is being constructed far below the street level at that point.

The sinking of the pavement broke the water main, and in a few minutes there was a lake a foot deep extending from the Waldorf-Astoria curb line to the other side of the thoroughfare.

Basement Stores Flooded.

Basement shops on the south side of the street were flooded, and merchants with stocks in cellars made haste to remove them to the upper floors.

The sinking of the pavement stopped all vehicle traffic through Thirty-third street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, pending an investigation of the extent of the damage and the condition of the street.

The first break appeared on the south side of the street, a little west of the Fifth avenue curb line.

Almost immediately the entire stretch caved in, the asphalt, however, holding well together, except at the gutter intersections. Through breaks there water rushed up, flooding the street.

Hotel Guests Alarmed.

When the setting closed there was a pronounced slant in the pavement from the Waldorf east.

A great crowd hurried from Broadway and Fifth avenue to look at the scene. Guests of the Waldorf-Astoria were alarmed, but the management informed them that the sinking was not serious and had been anticipated. It was caused by the shifting of the ground, which is of a soft and porous nature in that vicinity. Engineers for the Pennsylvania Railroad say that there is no danger of a bad collapse.

Tried to Borrow $100,000 of Ring Manager Cavanagh To-Day and His Defalcation Was Discovered —Took Bets from J. W. Gates.

CLUBHOUSE "GOOD THING" ONLY ONE NOT BACKED.

Commissioner Promises to Make Good, Having Taken Erratic Bettor Under His Charge and Placed His Eccentric Wagers in the Ring.

Edward Brown, agent for Club House Commissioner Hugh Collins, accepted wages at the Brighton Beach Race Track from John W. Gates, Senator "Pat" McCarren, Joseph Cassidy and other noted plungers on Tuesday and failed to place $25,000 on a "good thing" which won.

To-day, when payment was due, Brown confessed that he had not managed to place the money and acted like a demented man.

"I want to borrow $100,000 for a few days," said Brown to John Cavanaugh, manager of the betting ring.

Cavanaugh took Brown in charge, and after questioning him at length about the queer operations, came to the conclusion that he was not in his right state of mind. Brown was let out of the race track by Pinkerton detectives and warned never to enter the courses controlled by the Jockey Club.

Said He Would Make Good.

Collins announced that as Brown had been his recognized agent in the ring he would make good every dollar of indebtedness incurred. In fact, said Collins, he would pay all around, even if he had to mortgage his house.

The discovery of the $25,000 "hold" created consternation at the track. Bookmakers' fears were quieted at Collins's public announcement that he would pay every dollar.

At the clubhouse the men, whose wagers Brown had held out, were appeased by Collins's word.

Collins's name is good for any amount in the gambling world. Brown accepted wagers right and left from members of the clubhouse, and many of those he held out altogether, failing to secure himself by a hedge bet.

John E. Madden was the hero in another paddock runaway here to-day. His own horse, attached to a yellow sulky, standing unbridled in the paddock, became excited and after dashing around the enclosure made a wild dash for the gate, past which hundreds were edging their way to the track.

Running alongside the horse for a dozen steps or so, Madden suddenly threw creation around the horse's head, grabbing his ear, and clapping the other hand over his nostrils, brought him to a halt in a lift. It was a great piece of work and Madden was justly proud of it. He deserved all the applause that went with it. With a bride on it might have been a simple matter to stop the horse, but without it was extremely dangerous.

Whitney's Pair Ran One-Two.

Fancy and Adriana, fillies belonging to Harry Payne Whitney, ran one-two in the Venus Stakes here to-day. He had the mount on Keep Moving, which was heavily played when the announcement was made that the filly would carry 113 instead of 119 pounds, as the programme said. When the field was lined up at the barrier, the filly reared and fell with Dugan under him. For a while Dugan appeared to be seriously hurt, but after a short wait he was remounted and was away with the field. Keep Moving, however, had none of the speed she showed last time and was never prominent.

Roseben is the King.

Roseben is the king of sprinters all right. If any proof was needed it was furnished in the opening dash where the "big train" carried 147 pounds and practically tow-roped his field, winning by a length and a half from Smoker, a
